Fitzpatrick at Art Center

By Karin Bartow

The exhibition of James Fitzpatrick's "Functional Forms" at the South Shore Art Center from September 16 to October 12 is the first public showing of this young man's contemporary, sculptural furniture-forms which he only began designing and making four years ago.

With an education in biochemistry and electronics, and six months experience as an attendant on one of the last chronic mental wards of Boston State Hospital, Fitzpatrick became the Coordinator of a vocational rehabilitation center for the mentally ill in 1975.

Known as WestRox Park, and located in Hyde Park, the Center housed three units, two vocational and one clinical. Using his knowledge of wood working and tool handling from a youth spent helping to build a family house, Fitzpatrick established a shop that provided training in furniture making, refinishing and repairing.

Since Fitzpatrick was not a formal "art" student, his modesty (or honesty) prevents him from describing his current profession as artist/sculptor. The "Functional Forms" that he's created, however, are from an artist's eye and artisan's hand. What's commendable about what he's accomplished is that he never had any formal furniture-making or sculpting training, and yet both skills are fully utilized in his pieces.

Fitzpatrick found that working in mental health leads you to a lot of self-exploration and he can find explanations for the why's of some of his forms. For example, he has an aversion to angular pieces, which he says comes from the female half of his androgyny.

Fitzpatrick lives in a 'child-size' attic apartment on Jerusalem Road, hardly big enough for his own hand-made furnishings, much less the machinery, tools, and raw materials of furniture making. He is looking for an old barn or stable or larger space where he can continue to create new and more varied functional forms.

Wood Stoves

Need Permits

State Rep. Mary Jeanette Murray, R-Cohasset, registered her concern this week that homeowners who have purchased woodburning stoves may not be applying for installation permits.

According to a federal Housing and Urban Development (HUD) study conducted through the state fire marshal's office, 95 per cent of all fuel stove-related fires are caused by faulty installation.

As of July 1, 1979, all wood stove installed in Massachusetts must bear a metal label, indicating they have been properly tested by an approved testing laboratory.

However, regulations will only be in effect until November 15, 1979. Between November 15 and January 1, 1980 building inspectors will grant permits to install unlabeled stoves.

Rep. Murray feels the above situation is a reality which should be addressed.
